

Features of Traditional, Unique Parenting Plans Determined through the Legal System

Misunderstandings with children's daycares, schools and summer camps are common.

Negotiating, mediating or litigating with your former partner means:

1. Having to endure continued pressures to concede to his or her demands and
2. Substantial costs of time, money and emotional resources in inventing a parenting plan.

No group benefits, community support or advocacy for the unique schedule.

Gender biases within the system works against all parents.

This system has been a horrible failure with parents and children suffering from depression, anxiety and a host of other lifelong social and

Parents on unique parenting plans have different schedules from co-workers and other single parents.

Children on unique parenting plans have different schedules from their friends and classmates.

Parents and children with unique schedules have difficulty participating in community activities and accessing services.

Traditional parenting plans often feature in person transfers resulting in risk, conflict and negative interactions.

There is pressure for the lower income spouse, usually women, to design a parenting schedule that caters to the higher income spouse's schedule.
